Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: ...the paternal estate that had again devolved upon him, but when there, he was seized with a violent disease, and after lingering a short time died in the 45 th year of his age. There is not another graveyard in Ayrshire that contains so many mementoes of the persecution as that of Fenwick. Several who wandered in deserts, and hid in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth, have found a balm for their sorrow and suffering in the Lethe of death, and slumber for-getful of their wrongs in this little golgotha. To the north of the church is the burial place of the Howies of Lochgoin. There, neath a flat stone, lie the remains of James Howie, who suffered much during the persecution. Theyrlmical in-scription the stone bore was obliterated some years ago, and a prosaic one substituted. Though lengthy it is far in-ferior in my opinion to the former one. In these matters, being somewhat of a Conservative, I beg to present the reader with the old epitaph. It is preserved in the appendix to the Life of John Howie, and is somewhat of a curiosity. The dust here lies tinder this stone Of James Howie, and his son John These two both lived in Lochgoin And by Deaths power were called to join This place. The first, November twenty one, Years sixteen hundred ninety one The second, aged ninety year The first of July was brought here Years seventeen hundred and fifty-five, For owning truth made fugitive Their house twelve times, and cattle all Was robbd, and famly brought to thrall All these, before the Revolution Outlived Zions friends gainst opposition. And he said unto me, these are they which came out of great tribulation.--Eev. vii., 14. The voice said cry, What shall I ery? All flesh is grass, and so must ly...
