

The Naples Riviera (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Naples Riviera Museum, this Observing the daily life Of the populace, and bargain-hunting in the Strada de Tribunali, are agreeable enough for a while, but Of necessity there comes a time when the mind grows weary Of yelling people and of jostling crowds, of stuffy churches and of the chilly halls of the Museum, Of steep dirty streets and of glaring boulevards, SO that we begin to sigh for fresh air and a Change of scene. Nor is there any means of escape within the precincts Of the city itself from the eternal cracking of whips, from the insulting compliments (or complimentary insults) Of the incorrigible cabmen, from the continuous babel of unmusical voices, and from the reiterated strains Of Santa Lucia or Margari howled from raucous threats or strummed from rickety street - organs. Oh for peace, and rest, and a whiff of pure country air! For there are no walks in or around the City Of the Siren, where there is nowhere to stroll save the narrow strip of the much-vaunted Villa (which is either damp or dusty according to weather) or the fatiguing ascent amidst walled gardens and newly built houses to the heights Of the Vomero, which are covered with a raw suburb. Moreover our pristine delight in the place is beginning to ?ag, as we gradually realise that the city, like the majority of great modern towns, is being practically rebuilt to the annihilation of its Old-world features, which used to give to Naples its peculiar charm and its marked individuality amongst large sea-ports. Long ago has disappeared Santa Brigida, that picturesque high coloured Slum, on whose site stands the garish domed gallery Of which the Neapolitans are so proud; gone in these latter days is classic Santa Lucia with its.
