

A Classical Tour Through Italy, an MDCCCII, Vol. 3 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A Classical Tour Through Italy, an MDCCCII, Vol. 3 Procida is about two miles from the continent: its shore, towards the west, is comparatively low, but it swells gradually towards the east, and terminates in a bold promontory, the summit of which is crowned with the castle or royal palace. The prominence of this point on one side, and the Punta del Vomera about a mile from it to the south, form a little bay. The promontory is sufficiently lofty to entitle the island, of which it is the most conspicuous feature, to the epithet alta, which Virgil gives it, as the rocks which line its eastern and southern coast justify the word aspera employed by Statius. Besides the harbor which I have described, there are on the same coast several creeks, which afford shelter to fishing boats and small vessels, and contribute much to the variety and the romantic beauty that eminently characterize this and the neighboring shores and islands. There is no regular inn, I believe, in the town, but strangers are received and very well treated in the castle.
