The narrative of Ramas sorrow at the loss of Sfta, and his eager search for her in the jungle, contains nothing that demands any preliminary explanation. It comprises much poetical description, and a curious story of a female devotee named Sarvarf, who was of low caste, but obtained salvation through a mantra taught her by Mantaga the sage. The narrative is as follows:--Kamas meeting with Lakshmaua. Meantime the mighty hero Rama had returned towards his hermitage after killing the deer-formed Marietta, and ho carried the skin upon his shoulders to present it to Sita. Presently Lakshmana appeared with a sad countenance, and told him why he had left Sita alone in the hut. And Rama became greatly alarmed, and said:-- O my brother, you have done wrong in leaving Sitd alone: Women are generally devoid of sense, and no wise man would attend to their words. So saying, Rama ran with all speed to the hut, and his brother Lakshmana followed him; and when they came to the hut, they found that it was utterly deserted, Agony of Rama, and that Sita had gone they knew not where. At this sight Rama became speechless; his bow dropped from his hand, his hair became dishevelled, his girdle became loosened, and he sank upon the earth in a swoon. Lakshmana caught him in his arms, and fanned him with branches of new loaves, and splashed his face with water; and after awhile he regained his senses and cried out for Sita. They discover that Sita has left the hut. Then Rdma and Lakshmana both rose up and went History Of throughout the forest to search for the lost one; but they PjLKT lv found her not, and they returned in great grief to the hermitage and saw that it was as desolate as before. When it was evening ...
