These articles, which are called gahaz, are the property of the bride; and, if she be divorced, she takes them away with her. She cannot, therefore, with truth be said to be purchased. The furniture is sent, commonly borne by a train of camels, to the bridegrooms house. Often, among the articles of the gahaz, is a chair for the turban or head-dress koorsee el-emameh), alluded to in a former page. It is of a large size, but slight make; the bottom and back generally of cane-work; sometimes with a canopy. It is never used to sit upon. The turban, when placed upon it, is covered with a napkin of thick silk stuff, usually ornamented with Among the peasants, however, the father, or nearest male relation of the bride, receives the dowry, and gives nothing in return but the girl, and sometimes a little corn, &c. The bridegroom, in this case, supplies everything; even the dress of the bride. gold thread. There are sometimes sent two of these chairs; one for the husband, and the other for the wife. _ The bridegroom should receive his bride on the eve of Friday, or that of Monday; but the former is generally esteemed the more fortunate r eriod. Let us say, for instance, that the bride is to b conducted to him on the eve of Friday. During tw or three or more preceding nights, the street or quater in which the bridegroom lives is illuminated witi chandeliers and lanterns, or with lanterns and sroal lamps, suspended from cords drawn across from the bridegrooms and several other houses on e ch side to the houses opposite; and several small sili flags, each of two colours, generally red and green, are attached to other cords. An
