Excerpt from The Legend of Sir Perceval Studies Upon Its Origin, Vol. 1: Development, and Position, in the Arthurian Cycle

In the introductory chapter I have explained the ultimate object of these studies, and the scheme which I propose to follow in order to attain that object. To what I have said there I have little to add, but while these chapters were in the press M. Bediers admirable study of the Tristan of Thomas appeared, and I would here draw attention to certain remarks to be found therein, since they sound, as it were, the keynote of the Studies I here offer to the public. At the close of Chapter in., in discussing the probable date of the earliest Tristan poems, M. Bedier, having remarked that Chretien de Troyes semble moins avoir ete un createur epique quun habile arrangeur, continues, Entre la conquete de lAngleterre par les Normands (1066) et le premier roman conserve de Chretien de Troyes (1168), une periode seculaire secoule. Plusieurs indications concordent a prouver que pendant cette periode sest developpee toute une premiere floraison de poemes Arthuriens. (The writer then cites the basreliefs of the Cathedral of Modena, the presence of Arthurian names in Italian charters of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and the evidence of the priests from Laon, as to Arthurian traditions in Devonshire, early in the twelfth century, concluding), Cest a cette haute epoque, dans cette terra incognita que peu a peu la critique parviendra sans doute a explorer, quil nous faut necessairement placer nos plus anciens poemes de Tristan.
