

Chinamen at Home (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Chinamen at Home It has been said that the sites of cities are characteristic of the civilizations to which they belong. The cities of the earliest civilizations were built on the banks of the great rivers flowing through alluvial plains. Such cities were Thebes, and Nineveh, and Babylon. The cities of the secondary civilizations were built around mountain-peaks, and promontories. Such cities were Athens, and Corinth, and Rome. The chief cities of China, with perhaps the solitary exception of Peking, belong to the first category, and are obvious survivals from the primitive civilizations. The structure of the Chinese city, the quaint old world-ism in the dress and pose of its crowds, the bits of fossilized patriarchalism that crop up at every turn, might have been transferred bodily from the plain of Shinar.
