

Promoting Childrens Rights in Social Work and Social Care: A Guide to Participatory Practice (Children in Charge)

Children have a right to participate in decisions that affect them, and their participation can have positive effects such as increased self-esteem and confidence, as well as improving decisions made by professionals working with them. The right children have to be heard is high on the public agenda, but there are still debates over how and when they can be involved, what form their participation should take and organisational cultures that facilitate this. Children and Participation addresses these questions and the nature of childrens participation in the social care field. The author discusses the reality of the world in which children live and outlines definitions of participation and current initiatives for childrens involvement. Four research studies on childrens participation in the UK are then presented, based on interviews with children aged 6-19. They cover childrens views on decision-making and recording processes, their opinions on the social work help they have received, whether they feel their views have been taken into account, and the responses of the agencies involved. This book will be essential reading for any social work or social care professional working with children, as well as students and academics in the social work and social care fields. It will also be invaluable to those involved in promoting childrens rights and child participation. This series concentrates on the theme of childrens rights, reflecting the increasing knowledge and practice in the area. The perspectives of empowerment and of voice run through the series and the United Nations Convention of the Right of the Child is used as a benchmark.
