CHAPTER VII The Second Part Of Don Quijote, 1614-1616 After finishing the first part of Don Quijote Cervantes waited ten years before beginning the second part. And it is more than likely that the sequel would never have been written, had not a spurious continuation appeared. This came into Cervantes hands toward the end of the year 1613, and he at once announced that his own true second part would shortly be ready.¹⁰⁸ As yet he had not written a word of it, and for a man already bending with age and the dropsy, shuffling in his gait, it was not a little to promise. But, he adds, who can put a curb on his ambitions? He could not let his true knight, with his heroic visions and resolves, be for ever coupled and confused in the worlds thought with the chicken-hearted counterfeit. Cervantes kept his promise: within a year the true second part was done, and though, Sancho had warned him it would all be hurry, hurry, hurry, like the tailor on Easter Eve, this second part was done better than the first. It was a great achievement, for which we must thank not alone Cervantes but also the author of the apocryphal sequel--out of so grave an injury as he tried to work Cervantes has so great a blessing come. And we must be grateful to Avellaneda, as he styled himself, not only because he was the means of stirring Cervantes into action, but because his book, coarse and clumsy though it was, contributed phrase and incident and even plot to the true second part. It was inevitable: any book that Cervantes read as intently as we may be sure he did this spurious Don Quijote, was bound to be reproduced in the true one. In this case it was but a return of the same compliment--Avellaneda pillaged right and
