In this emergency the board of education of Charlottenburg made a 10-year lease of an area nearly double the size of the original site from the Royal Prussian Department of Forests. This site is also in the Grinewald and is as easily accessible as the other. The shacks containing the classrooms, the housekeeping department, the resting-shelters, and the open-air gymnasium were transferred to the new grounds. The experiment had proved so satisfactory that the authorities gladly added new buildings and equipment for the plant. Administration.--Even this brief narration of the establishment and development of the Charlottenburg Forest School indicates a corresponding deepening of the basic idea. Its founders realized that they were dealing with a vital problem and were not satisfied merely with having conceived the plan and provided the physical features necessary to its development. They realized that the real Fig. 01.--At the Charlottenburg Open-air School both boys and girls have separate walled-in spaces for outdoor gymnastics. problem was evolving methods and principles. It is difficult to trace these steps, because inner progress and growth in an organization or institution like the spiritual development of an individual can not accurately be expressed by facts or figures. Class of children to be admitted.--The first problem that pressed for solution was to determine and to set forth characteristics that made a child a suitable candidate for the forest school. The forest school afforded a new resource, and both teachers and physicians studied the children with that new interest which is born when an added practice or invention in the world offers a new possibility for discovered need. Both teachers and physicians decided upon mu...
