

Dissertation proposal sample (Dissertation Writing Guide Book 1)

A good proposal begins with a suggestion for the actual study's title. Remember that by the time the proposal becomes the dissertation, the title may change; do not consider it final at this stage. The background section develops room for the arguments that you would later use to justify your choice. It may begin right away with a claim you want to make or build up as a story whose climax leads to your research questions, providing a number of arguments on the way. The background section contains discussion of the reasons for selecting the proposed topic. You discuss, with the help of scholarly literature, the research gaps the study would fill and develop a clear scope for the topic. The section may be divided into a few subsections, each connected with the others by means of contextual discussions. For the proposed topic, we begin with establishing how UK has a multicultural environment in the food industry, with entrepreneurs belonging to almost every culture of the world.
