Not illustrated. 1863 Excerpt: ...were revived in the following year by the 8th George III., c. 5. These Acts of Henry VIII. simply provided for the substitution of a new road where more convenient to the locality than an existing one. They did not attempt to improve road-making, or to vary the incidence of the cost of maintaining highways. With the increase, however, of population and of intercourse, the charge for the repair of roads in parishes or districts that happened to be centres of industry or to lie in the line of traffic, grew so heavy that it became necessary to devise some relief. An obvious suggestion was to require those who caused the wear and tear of the roads to aid the parishioners in maintaining them. Especially was such a step called for in parts of the Weald of Kent, and of Sussex, where Iron Works had multiplied and attained a great development, rendering the roads, originally indifferent, impassable to the public and burdensome to the inhabitants, by the heavy traffic to and from the mills. A remedy for this evil was accordingly attempted by an Act referred to by Mr. M. A. Lower in his able and interesting article on Iron Works, in Vol. II. of the Sussex Archaeological Collections, the 27 Eliz., c. 19. The statute in question is entitled An Act for the preservacion of Tymber in the Wildes of the Counties of Sussex, Surrey, and Kent, and for the Amendment of High Waies de caied by carriage to and fro Yron Mylles there. The first two sections express the fear then entertained lest the Counties of Sussex, Surrey, and Kent should become denuded of timber by the great consumption in the furnaces, and prohibit the erection of new mills and the burning of oak, ash, or elm trees, apt for the making of good and sufficient clefware or sawing timber. ...
