

Teaching Young Children Effective Listening Skills (Educating Our Children Book 9)

This concise publication about teaching children how to listen is written in easy-to-read and to understand terms. It is an overview of successful techniques used in teaching children listening skills written for 1. Parents of preschool and elementary school students 2. Homeschooling parents 3. Preschool teachers 4. Elementary school teachers For many years, educators of young children have emphasized the importance of learning by doing. The premise has been that students who are actively engaged in the learning process do better in school than those students who are merely passive participants. At the same time, the idea of learning by listening has received little attention! Educators are now beginning to realize that effective listening, especially teaching students to listen, is dependent upon the inter-relationship of three activities: Speaking Listening and Doing. Before students can do, however, they must have opportunities for intake of information and ideas usually attained from someone who is speaking. Listening today, as a general skill, is difficult. The overall noise level of various sounds that surround us has increased to the point of a health hazard. Television, a fascination for most children, has not promoted the habit of attentive listening. Rather, either it has excited students in ways that have been detrimental to learning, or it has lulled them into passivity. Since there are many reasons for skill in listening, teaching preschoolers to listen helps them to form the habit of listening attentively early in life. Waiting to learn listening skills in school is too late! Actually, even as adults, how well people succeed often depends a great deal on how well they listen, and that is dependent upon how much they have been exposed to the various functions of listening as children. In schools, discriminating listening is a requisite for success academically, athletically, socially and creatively. Listening is the basic element of all communication skills, for it is one thing to speak but quite another to follow through upon what someone else is saying.
