

Attitudes Toward Diversity at a Proprietary College: Dissertation Research

This study investigated the relationship between demographic characteristics and diversity attitudes. It situates attitudes toward diversity into the three following categories: diversity optimist, diversity realist, and diversity pessimist. This study utilizes correlational research data between two descriptive survey instruments. De Meuse and Hostager, 2001 Reaction to Diversity Inventory (RTD) was used to measure diversity attitudes based on a three-tiered scale. A demographic questionnaire was used to obtain relevant information related to educational background, gender, race and various other characteristics. A non-random sample of Rasmussen College employees and students were asked to voluntarily complete the survey during the first week of the fall quarter, October 4th, 2004. The RTD survey and demographic questionnaires were distributed at the four Rasmussen Minnesota campus locations. Survey data measuring diversity attitudes were collected and analyzed from 276 employees and students using nonparametric procedures. The results of the participants responses were reported using descriptive statistics (t-tests, chi Square and Pearsons Correlation Coefficient tests). The sample was limited to the respondents that provided both a completed RTD and demographic questionnaire. The results of the correlational analysis between demographic characteristics and attitudes toward diversity indicated that a positive relationship existed between certain demographic characteristics and attitudes toward diversity. The following groups of participants had significantly more positive attitudes toward diversity than their counterparts:
