

The Jungle Folk of Africa (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Jungle Folk of Africa
In the realm of the unknown, Africa is the absolute, said Victor Hugo. Since the time of Hugo the civilized world has become better acquainted with African geography; but the Africans themselves are still a people unknown. A certain noted missionary, while on furlough in America, after delivering a masterly and brilliant lecture on Africa to an audience of coloured people, gave an opportunity for persons in the audience to ask him questions pertaining to the subject. He was rather abashed when an elderly negro, who had been deeply interested in the lecture, called out: Say, Mistah S., is they any colloed folks ovah thah? Most people know that there are a goodly number of colloed folks in Africa; but the knowledge of the majority extends only to the colour of the skin. And if in this book I endeavour to make the Africans known as they really are, it is because I believe that they are worth knowing. In the generation that has passed since the books of Du Chaillu were the delight of boys - old boys and young - the African has received but scant sympathy in literature. Du Chaillu had the mind of a scientist and the heart of a poet. He never understated the degradation of the African nor exaggerated his virtues, but he recognized in him the raw material out of which manhood is made. He realized that the African, like ourselves, is not a finality, but a possibility - the tadpole of an archangel, as genius has phrased it. About the Publisher
