

Netherlorn: Argyllshire and Its Neighbourhood (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Netherlorn: Argyllshire and Its Neighbourhood The district illustrated and described in the following pages is, like many other interesting by-ways in the Highlands, still comparatively unknown. Of its scenes and legends little has been written, and what has been is to be found in scattered fragments through a multitude of books. In the preparation of this volume, the information contained in the works hereafter mentioned has been freely made use of. The accounts given in Forduns Chronicle (A.D. 1380), Dean Monros Description of the Western Isles (1549), Martins Description of the Western Islands (written about 1695), Pennants Tour in Scotland (1772), and MacCullochs Western Isles (circ. 1819), form a consecutive series of description and observation from the fourteenth century downwards. The earlier spelling of place-names was phonetic, and it is surprising how little, in many hundred years, the pronunciation of those Gaelic words has changed. Many islands mentioned in Monros book, however, cannot now be identified; and even in MacCullochs Description, written just ninety years ago, there are two islands, called by him Garveloch-na-skian and Garveloch-na-more, which are not now known by these names.
