

Celtic Researches, on the Origin, Traditions Language, of the Ancient Britons: With Some Introductory Sketches, on Primitive Society (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Celtic Researches, on the Origin, Traditions Language, of the Ancient Britons: With Some Introductory Sketches, on Primitive Society Of all human attainments, the art, which enables man to communicate his opinions, or his feelings, in the shape of oral, and written language, - is the most precious in its value. By the chain of this magical union, those are incorporated, whom the distance of times and of scene would else have separated; - the early, and the recent ages, meet; - a barter of intellectual treasure is negotiated, - and the civilized nations of the earth are like neighbouring families; - in a word, all acquisitions to the use, and the ornament of the social world, are streams from this fountain.
