

No chanst fer larin: Hope Renewed: Southern Appalachian Settlement Schools as Early Initiators of Integrated Services

Long forgotten by the rest of America, the Southern Appalachian mountain people were invaded by outsiders in need of the abundant timber and coal resources required to fuel the growth of the Industrial Revolution. With their arrival, the plight of the mountain people became starkly obvious. Katherine Pettit and May Stone heard the heart-wrenching plea of Uncle Solomon Everidge who said that he had had No chanst fer larin, and it was his deepest hope that his grandchildren would have the chance denied him and his fellow mountaineers. Dr. Mary Sloop also heard similar pleas in Crossnore, NC. Through the efforts of Katherine Pettit, May Stone, and Dr. Mary Sloop, the people of this remote region of the mountains not only were given an opportunity to learn through the establishment of settlement schools, they were also given health services, social services through community development of roads, employment opportunities, and so much more. No chanst fer larin: Hope Renewed traces the history of integrated services from the early 1900s to the 1970s in three Southern Appalachian settlement schools: Hindman Settlement School (KY), Pine Mountain Settlement School (KY), and Crossnore School (NC) and serves as a model for the integration of education, health, and social services for the 21st Century.
