Not illustrated. 1843 Excerpt: ...to him to beware. The hint was taken, and turning to the right, the invaders entered the city by the Cowcaddens and Cowloan. A day or two previous, the Marquis of Argyle, who was in the possession of the town, with the greater portion of the clergy, fled in dismay, and those presbyterian citizens who remained behind were in the utmost state of terror and confusion. Cromwell, however, was too good a tactician to attempt violent proceedings. He therefore sent for Mr. Patrick Gillespie, the minister of the Outer High Church, then the governing ecclesiastic of the town, and having entertained him hospitably, and given him a long prayer, converted him to the opinion, that of a verity he (Cromwell) was one of the elect. A few days after, Cromwell went in state to the Cathedral. It so happened that on this occasion the celebrated Zachary Boyd, minister of the Barony parish, was the preacher; and having taken advantage of the presence of the evil one to tell him of his misdeeds, the generals secretary, boiling with indignation, begged leave of his master to pistol the scoundrel. No, no, responded Cromwell, we will manage him in another way. He accordingly invited Zachary to dinner, and converted him by a prayer of three hours duration. It is almost unnecessary that we should follow minutely in detail the various religious tumults which took place in Glasgow during the dark period of persecution in Scotland--common as they were to every locality in the west part of the country; we shall therefore content ourselves with briefly enumerating the more important. In the year 1666, numbers of the presbyterian citizens were hanged in the streets, while others, under threats of a similar doom, were prohibited fro...
