Of the Periodical Diurnal Changes of the Barometer. The Detail Of Facts. V. The detail of Facts is comprehended in the following record of observations made on the Barometer as regularly as I was able to perform it every half-hour, both day and night, during, the lutation which intervened between the 31st of March and the 29th. of April 1794. To these I have added the state of the Thermometer and Wind, with the appearance of the sky. VI. My observations of the Barometer were taken with scrupulous exactness, and although the weighty hand of sleep has more than once deprived me of observations that I was just about to make and was anxious to record, I have never ventured to assume any probable state of the Mercury as an actual observation. VII. With VII. With respect to the Thermometer, although it was liable to some inaccuracy from my not being able to preserve the apartment in which it was hung uniformly open or shut, yet, as the variations from this cause were trifling, and never obscured the regular and progressive rise and fall which it observes at different periods of the day, I conceive that my record is sufficiently exact for enabling me to decide with safety that the daily fluctuations which appeared in the Barometer were not connected with the daily vicissitudes of heat and cold. VIII. Although the state of the wind wa...
