

A Dreamers Tales, and Other Stories (Classic Reprint)

Dublin. Somebody said He looks like a portrait of Robert Louis Stevenson, and indeed in the sparse moustache, in the eager eyes and in the suggestion of hollowness in the face, there was a resemblance. He was speaking on poetry and by his intense interest in his subject, he was able to enliven his audience as though by the spell of poetry itself. Every poem he quoted seemed inspired. He had none of the tricks, but everybody could see he was a natural orator. He was Lord Dunsany whose plays The Glittering Gate, and King Armines and the Unknown Warrior had been produced by the Irish Theatre (in 1909 and 1911). He was an officer in the British Army, a notable cricketer and a good huntsman and had already been through one war. But one could see that what he prized above all were the things of the imagination. He was praising the work of a young poet who belonged to his own territory in Ireland the County Meath. He spoke of that county with such gusto that one felt that Dunsany himself would put the fact that he was a Meath man before the fact that he was an Irishman. Meath is Irelands middle county. It has the richest soil, and for that reason it has been fought for by every conquistadore who broke into Ireland. Before the Normans came Meath had already a thousand years of story. It was the demesne of the Ard-ri, the Emperor of the Celtic-Irish states. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)
