

Reading, Riting, and Reconstruction: The Education of Freedmen in the South, 1861-1870 (African American Studies)

This study of education for freedmen following Emancipation is the definitive treatment of the subject. Employing a wide range of sources, Robert C. Morris examines the organizations that staffed and managed black schools in the South, with particular attention paid to the activities of the Freedmans Bureau. He looks as well at those who came to teach, a diverse groupwhite, black, Northern, Southernand at the curricula and textbooks they used. While giving special emphasis to the Freedmens Bureau school program, Morris places the freedmens educational movement fully in its nineteenth-century context, relating it both to the antislavery crusade that preceded it and to the conservative era of race relations that followed.
