Excerpt from Antiquarian Repertory, Vol. 2 of 4: A Miscellaneous Assemblage of Topography, History, Biography, Customs, and Manners; Intended to Illustrate and Preserve Several Valuable Remains of Old Times

The uncommon degree of favour which the First Volume of this Collection has experienced, and the addition of so many truly respectable names to the List of Subscribers since its appearance, have relieved the Editor and Publisher from the doubt and anxiety which oppressed him during the formation of the Plan, the arrangement of the Materials, and the publication of the Work. He is by no means inclined, nor would it become him, to deny that those painful emotions were excited, in some degree, by his reflections on the importance of his Undertaking, considered merely in a pecuniary point of view; for he had spared no expense in the mechanical and decorative parts of the composition of his Book, and its unfavourable reception would have been attended by a serious loss; but they arose, in a far greater measure, from his apprehension that he might probably fail in his humble attempt to furnish matter worthy of the attention of such Readers as those who had patronized him; that he was, perhaps, preparing a repast from which the hungry might rise unsatisfied, and the delicate disgusted - and that he might possibly be doomed to suffer that most severe of all disappointments which we, too often, unhappily experience from the displeasure of those whom, of all others, we wish to please. He has the happiness, however, to present this Second Volume to the Public, under impressions wholly different.
