

The Natural History of Society in the Barbarous and Civilized State, Vol. 1: An Essay Towards Discovering the Origin and Course of Human Improvement (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Natural History of Society in the Barbarous and Civilized State, Vol. 1: An Essay Towards Discovering the Origin and Course of Human Improvement This work was suggested by the archbishop of Dublin, and it has had throughout the benefit of his graces assistance and superintendence. It is necessary that this should be emphatically stated, in order that the author may escape the imputation of presumption in discussing a subject to which his grace had already directed his attention in his Lectures on Political Economy. He would not have attempted to bend the bow of Ulysses, had he not been invited to the task by its legitimate owner, and taught by him how to draw the string and aim the shaft. His grace, however, is not responsible for more than general directions; he has strong claims on the merits of the work, but all its imperfections rest on the authors head. The design of it is to determine, from an examination of the various forms in which society has been found, what was the origin of civilization; and under what circumstances those attributes of humanity which in one country become the foundation of social happiness, are in another perverted to the production of general misery.
