

Malabar and Its Folk (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Malabar and Its Folk When Mr. Gopal Panikkar pressed me as his old teacher to write a few sentences by way of introduction to this book, I felt that, though one who could lend a better known name would have been a more influential sponsor to it, I could not refuse his repeated request. And indeed it gives me no little pleasure to trace in these pages the germination of the interest implanted in him by our study in the Madras Christian College of the rudiments of Ethnography and the history of Early Institutions. And here lies one of the elements of general interest which the book possesses. What is the effect of Western studies on Hindu minds? To this common question the book affords an answer. The reader will see plainly here the manner in which, and the extent to which, Indian gentlemen of education are assimilating the science of the West and in its light modifying their views of Indian life and tradition. This leads on to another element of value possessed by the book. Graduates of Indian Universities may legitimately be expected to transmit to those of their fellow countrymen who have not had their advantages the illumination from the West which they have themselves received. It is through them above all that what is good in Western civilisation and thought must reach the Indian mind. More of them are discharging this duty than is sometimes supposed.
