

News as a Cultural Product: A Cross-Cultural Study of Language Use in British and Norwegian Online Newspapers

This thesis explores language use in Norwegian and British online newspapers. The hypotheses that are examined investigate whether there are differences between the countries newspapers that are expressed linguistically, and that are due to cultural differences. Second, potential similarities are investigated, and the idea that the language used will be similar because of the impact globalisation has on the production of news routines and values. Third, possible differences in language use between types of newspapers are looked at. The theoretical framework on which the methodology is based lies within the realms of the critical tradition of discourse analysis, which is a multidisciplinary field on the boundaries of linguistics, media studies and cultural studies. This thesis is relevant for all students and researchers within the aforementioned fields.
